The Month of Remember — a tragic novel of hope and survival

“Honey, wait,” I said. But she ignored my plea and continued walking. Whether she heard me or not, I didn’t know. She was riveted to the form of the small boy as if she were mesmerized, drawn by some invisible force.

“Stop,” I said to her, but she continued.

I felt I had to do something for her safety. I went after her and tried to stop her. She was about four feet from the boy when I reached her, and suddenly the ghost vanished, but the strobe effect continued.

What would you do if lamps began strobing in your home? What if your furniture started rearranging itself, with chairs flying around the room? What if strange knocks and screams came out of nowhere? What would you think? If you were Virginia and Tim Lee, parents of a recently deceased son, you would think it was your six-year-old child come back to tell you something.

Combining the bumps in the night chill of a Stephen King thriller with the heartbreaking loss of xxx (name a bestselling novel about lost love or a dead child), France Lee’s debut novel The Month of Remember features the tragic story of two parents on the verge of divorce who are given another chance — if only they can get the message. Will they learn? Or will they become more frightened, more distant, more devastated by the eerie events around them?

You can find out by reading The Month of Remember, now available at www.Lulu.com.
